LEARNING TO SHARE

YOU WILL LEARN:

- that it is not easy for young children to share.
- that you should be a good example and show the children how to share.
- that you should encourage and help children while they are learning to share.

SHARING

This article will help you help children learn to share. Also, it will help you to understand young children and know what to expect from them.

ENCOURAGING SHARING

Some toddlers share without being asked and without being taught to. However, learning to share is hard for most children. Young children think about themselves and what they want or need. Thinking about the needs of others is the beginning of learning to share. Two and three-year-old children should not be expected to share. They are still working on meeting their own needs. By age four, many children will share some of their things. By age six or seven, children begin to understand how to cooperate with other children. Playing in groups gives children a chance to learn about sharing and taking turns.

In your family, you may decide that all toys and games belong to the family, not to any one child. As the parent, you need to explain that to the children. Then show them what you mean. For example, when a child has finished using a toy and another child picks it up, say out loud that it belongs to that child now. When he is done it will belong to the next child, etc. Explain to the children that this is called "sharing." If they want a toy back, they will have to wait for another turn. Explain this process to all the children. Then follow through with your promise.

Tell the children rules in a way that they understand. You could say, "First you go down the slide, then John, and then Sandy. This is clearer to children than saying, "You must all take turns."

GUIDELINE TO ENCOURAGE SHARING

- Read books about sharing to the children. Your local children's librarian may be able to suggest some books and videos about sharing.
- When playing "turn taking" games, be sure that each child has a chance to go first.
- Support and praise children when they share. For example, say, "I liked the way you let John play with that toy. You must be proud of yourself."
- Do not force young children to share. This may cause the children to resent sharing.
- Set a good example. Talk about sharing. Share with the children.
- Sharing can be fun. Children need to try it to learn it.

ACTIVITIES TO TRY WITH CHILDREN

- Every day, do something in which you share or take turns with the children.
- Talk about sharing. Talk about how good it feels when others share with us.
